

I am confident that you share my belief that your letter of February 8, 1962 to Secretary McNamara should not be seized upon by Executive Branch employees—many of them holding the same policy-making positions of responsibility they did under the Eisenhower Administration—as a new claim of authority to withhold information from the Congress and the public. A Subcommittee staff study indicates that during the year between the time you took office and February 8, 1962, the claim of an “executive privilege” to withhold government information was not used successfully once, compared to the dozens of times in previous years administrative employees held up “executive privilege” as a shield against public and Congressional access to information.

Although your letter of February 8, 1962 stated clearly that the principle involved could not be applied automatically to restrict information, this warning received little public notice. Clarification of this point would, I believe, serve to prevent the rash of restrictions on government information which followed the May 17, 1954 letter from President Eisenhower.

Sincerely,

Hon. JOHN E. MOSS,
Chairman, Special Government Information Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in reply to your letter of last month inquiring generally about the practice this Administration will follow in invoking the doctrine of executive privilege in withholding certain information from the Congress.

As your letter indicated, my letter of February 8 to Secretary McNamara made it perfectly clear that the directive to refuse to make certain specific information available to a special subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee was limited to that specific request and that “each case must be judged on its merits”.

As you know, this Administration has gone to great lengths to achieve full cooperation with the Congress in making available to it all appropriate documents, correspondence and information. That is the basic policy of this Administration, and it will continue to be so. Executive privilege can be invoked only by the President and will not be used without specific Presidential approval. Your own interest in assuring the widest public accessibility to governmental information is, of course, well known, and I can assure you this Administration will continue to cooperate with your subcommittee and the entire Congress in achieving this objective.

Sincerely,

(s) JOHN F. KENNEDY.

*President of the United States,
The White House,

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The use of the claim of “executive privilege” to withhold government information from the Congress and the public is an issue of importance to those who recognize the need for a fully informed electorate and for a Congress operating as a co-equal branch of the Federal Government.

In a letter dated May 17, 1954, President Eisenhower used the “executive privilege” claim to refuse certain information to a Senate Subcommittee. In a letter dated February 8, 1962, President Kennedy also refused information to a Senate Subcommittee. There the similarity ends, for the solutions of “executive privilege” problems varied greatly in the two Administrations.

Time after time during his Administration, the May 17, 1954 letter from President Eisenhower was used as a claim of authority to withhold information about government activities. Some of the cases during the Eisenhower Administration involved important matters of government, but in the great majority of cases Executive Branch employees far down the administrative line from the President claimed the May 17, 1954 letter as authority for withholding information about routine developments. A report by the House Committee on Government Operations lists 44 cases of Executive Branch officials refusing information on the basis of the principles set forth in President Eisenhower's letter.

President Kennedy carefully qualified use of the claim of "executive privilege". In a letter of February 8, 1962 refusing information to a Senate Subcommittee, he stated that the "principle which is at stake here cannot be automatically applied to every request for information." Later, President Kennedy clarified his position on the claim of "executive privilege", stating that—

"... this Administration has gone to great lengths to achieve full cooperation with the Congress in making available to it all appropriate documents, correspondence and information. That is the basic policy of this Administration, and it will continue to be so. Executive privilege can be invoked only by the President and will not be used without specific Presidential approval."

As a result of President Kennedy's clear statement, there was no longer a rash of "executive privilege" claims to withhold information from the Congress and the public. I am confident you share my views on the importance to our form of government of a free flow of information, and I hope you will reaffirm the principle that "executive privilege" can be invoked by you alone and will not be used without your specific approval.

Sincerely,

JOHN E. MOSS, Chairman.

HON. JOHN E. MOSS,
*Chairman, Foreign Operations and Government
Information Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations,
House Office Building,

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have your recent letter discussing the use of the claim of "executive privilege" in connection with Congressional requests for documents and other information.

Since assuming the Presidency, I have followed the policy laid down by President Kennedy in his letter to you of March 7, 1962, dealing with this subject. Thus, the claim of "executive privilege" will continue to be made only by the President.

This administration has attempted to cooperate completely with the Congress in making available to it all information possible, and that will continue to be our policy.

I appreciate the time and energy that you and your Subcommittee have devoted to this subject and welcome the opportunity to state formally my policy on this important subject.

Sincerely,

(s) LYNDON B. JOHNSON.

HON. RICHARD M. NIXON,
*President of the United States,

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The claim of "executive privilege" as authority to withhold government information has long been of concern to those of us who support the principle that the survival of a representative government depends on an electorate and a Congress that are well informed.

As you know, some administrations in the past made it a practice to pass along to Executive branch subordinates a discretionary authority to claim "executive privilege" as a basis to refuse information to the Congress. The practice of delegating this grave Presidential responsibility was ended by President John F. Kennedy when he restored a policy similar to that which existed under previous strong administrations, including those of Presidents
